Audits vs. Inspections

By: Destinee Nelson

There is often confusion about the difference between audits and inspections. The purpose of each may seem the same, but they are slightly different. Audits focus on why, while inspections focus on what. The purpose of an audit is to get the confidence that processes are working well. An audit involves various layers to answer a “why” question. It involves exploratory reviews involving documentation, risk assessments, and nonconformities, etc. While an audit may need more effort in finding an answer, an inspection is less complicated. The answer to an inspection question will involve a straightforward yes or no answer.

Inspections focus more on the action, while audits are about the process. Inspections review a single point in time, but an audit follows a process from start to finish. An inspection simply looks at the product or service. The process of an inspection is quite simple, it either clears the project if it meets the requirements specification or rejects it. If it is rejected, its loss can be reworked at an extra cost. Inspections must be conducted at every step to minimize the chances of product failure.
